COMMENTS TO THE AUTHOR:
Dear Author,

Your revision has failed to reach our expectation. First of all, you have not followed our instruction on elucidating the structure of your paper, which in its form fails to present your arguments in a clear manner. The literature review and methodology parts are very short and unclear. The whole structure is far from clear enough. The article is still very short and there is a repetition of the paper. It's far from acceptable to copy and paste your paper within the very same submission, making the whole length unnecessarily chunky and repetitive. We suggest that you follow our suggestions in the first letter closely and address all the concerns raised therein.

Moreover, your paper, in its current shape, still falls short of meeting the requirement of readable English and working grammar. There are still many grammatical or conjugation errors throughout the paper. Therefore, we insist that you must find a professional editing service to help you edit the text, without which it wouldn't be possible for us to proceed further.

We recommend that the author use a Language Editing Service offered by Elsevier, which can provide the author with a proofreading certificate. This service can be found at the following link (<https://webshop.elsevier.com/language-editing-services/>). When this proofreading is done, please ask the Service to provide you with a certificate, which can be added to the resubmission. Please prepare this certificate together with your resubmission next time.

COMMENTS TO THE AUTHOR:
Dear Professor Remisual,

We have received an initial review from an editorial review panel who reviews your manuscript FDHS-D-20-00121 "A Paradigm Shift of Young Mrnangkabas Social Behaviors".

The review panel recommends that this paper be revised before it can be sent out for peer review.

Below, please find the comments for your personal and revise your manuscript per recommendations:

Title: Currently the title fails to indicate the main research issue in the paper. Normally a good title should be able to intrigue the reader, sound interesting, and reflect the main content idea with the help of keywords. To break it down, first, a good title predicts the content of the research paper. Second, a good title should be interesting to the reader. Third, it should reflect the tone of the writing. Fourth and finally, it should contain important keywords that will make it easier to be located during a keyword search. In terms of format, all significant words are written with capital letters. Articles, prepositions, and conjunctions shouldn't be capitalized. The first and the last word in your heading should be written with a capital letter. Here are some tips for revising the title: (1) Make sure your research title describes (a) the topic, (b) the method, (c) the sample, and (d) the results of your study. (2) Avoid unnecessary words and jargons. You want a title that will be comprehensible even to people who are not experts in your field. (3) Make sure your title is between 5 and 15 words in length. (4) Verify that your title conforms to the standards and requirements for our Journal.

(4) Verify that your title conforms to the standards and requirements for our Journal.

Length: The total length of the article is roughly 3500 words, excluding tables, pictures, bibliography and figures. Although there is no explicit requirement concerning the length of an article, in general, there is an implicit assumption that a length shorter than 6,000 words shall render it difficult to offer a substantial argumentation of the claims raised in an article. The optimal length of an English academic paper is roughly 8,000 words. Indeed, this is simply a general, impressionistic statement which approximates a general guideline to authors. It by no means requires that the author should follow it strictly. Length, by the same token, is not equal to quality. Nevertheless, in the case of this article, a considerably shorter length has apparently done more harm than good, where the author cannot develop his points in full to the due level of sophistication and clarity – an issue to be backed up by evidences articulated thereafter in this decision report.

Write for publication in international journals: The current structure of the essay fails to present a clear presentation of the arguments advanced by the author. We advise that the authors section this article into different parts and merge the arguments. Introduction, for instance, has threefold purposes. First, one may want to trace previous work on the subject and set up the problem. Second, one needs to identify how his/her paper addresses that problem. That is key: explaining what one does to address the gaps of literature or problem of the paper. Finally, one should note the broader contributions and implications of the piece, either theoretical, empirical and/or policy relevant. For the analysis part, this section contains the meat of the paper, where you present the findings from your work, and you should keep two points in mind. First, make sure that your results speak to the theoretical and empirical questions that your paper raises in the first half – in other words, that your paper is cohesive throughout. Second, and particularly for qualitative papers, organize your results analytically or thematically – not, for example, in chronological order or according to some other simple accounting. You should be thoughtful about how to present your results to get the most out of your findings. Finally, for Conclusion, you may also find a combined discussion and conclusion at the end of the paper. What are the differences between a discussion and a conclusion? That can vary by author or paper, and it depends on how you've written up your results section. One way you can think about it is that the discussion section allows you to step back from the results section and reflect on the broader story or themes of your results and how they fit together. If you see a discussion section this way, then you can think about a conclusion as addressing three things: 1) summarizing what you did in the paper, including its main findings, 2) acknowledging the limitations of your work and 3) proposing steps for future research that builds on what you've done in the paper.

For a general idea of how to construct a publishable research paper, we strongly suggest that the authors refer to the following collection of research papers for ideas: <https://link.springer.com/journal/59647/122>

Theoretical contribution: This article has not done an adequate literature review in the field, for which it is difficult to locate the theoretical contribution of this article. Please state in a clear manner your unique contribution to the field by identifying how this article has improved our understanding of the matter without merely restating what has already been said. The author needs to make a strong case of how this article has indeed made a substantial contribution to the matter.

Proofreading the text: The author(s) should give a serious consideration by resorting to native speaker(s) for linguistic assistance in revising their text(s). A third-party reader can help to not only correct the linguistic problems as identified in this report, but also to double check some of the "strong" expressions by the authors which may bear certain marks of collective unconsciousness. For no small reasons it is that we strongly recommend you asking an English native-speaker to proofread the whole article before resubmission, so as to increase your chance of receiving positive reviews and feedbacks. We suggest a Language Editing Service offered by Elsevier, which can even provide the author with a proofreading certificate. This service can be found at the following link: <https://authorcenter.elsevier.com/language-editing-services/>. When this proofreading is done, please ask the Service to provide you with a certificate, which can be added to the resubmission.

When you resubmit your article, please state (e.g. by numbering, 1, 2, 3, ...) your response to all the above suggestions and explain how you have revised your article according to the suggestions.

With kind regards,
Journal's Editorial Office
